Evaluating native title

Since the Mabo decision in 1992, native title has emerged as a complex and controversial area of law and policy. This course offers three main pathways for understanding the area. At a technical level, we will break down that complexity by isolating the main elements of native title law (the requirements to prove a native title claim, the nature of the property right, extinguishment, future acts, interaction with State laws etc.), in each instance examining the basic legal rules and principles and how they translate into specific detail. Secondly, because native title law is shaped by broader forces, we will take account of the surrounding politics and policy debates. Thirdly, we will draw on experience with the practical operation of the Native Title Act to probe the relationship between the law as written and the reality on the ground.

There is no prescribed prior knowledge for the course, but a basic working knowledge of concepts in property and constitutional law will assist. The course content intersects with many other fields, including anthropology, mining law, international law, politics and history.

For more information about the content of the course, contact Sean Brennan at the UNSW Law School on 02 9385 2334 or s.brennan@unsw.edu.au.
